As the San Diego City College community considers the specific candidates, measures and propositions it will vote on in the November 2024 election, one person asks a more general question.

"Do you consider a better future for (all) generations when considering these important aspects of our government?" they asked.

City College stakeholders, which included student, faculty, staff and local residents from ages 14 to 72, recently shared their concerns through the City College Community Agenda survey forms available in English (https://sdcitytimes.com/news/2024/08/27/the-november-election-is-coming-contribute-to-the-city-college-community-agenda/) and Spanish (https://sdcitytimes.com/news/2024/08/30/se-acerca-la-eleccion-de-noviembre-contribuye-a-la-agenda-comunitaria-de-city-college/).

The Community Agenda is designed to identify issues and elicit questions that City Times Media reporters use to engage political candidates and focus their election reporting. For more on where the Community Agenda comes from, click here.

After launching the Community Agenda (https://sdcitytimes.com/campus-life/2024/09/19/city-college-community-agenda-the-issues-questions-you-want-candidates-to-address/) survey forms on Aug. 27, CTM has received 109 new responses, in addition to the original 16, for a total of 125.

This latest update of the agenda has the issues organized based on the frequency they were chosen by respondents.

Where did the City College Community Agenda come from?

The City College Community Agenda is modeled on The Citizens Agenda (https://www.thecitizensagenda.org/), "a guide for generating more responsive, inclusive and useful news coverage for voters."

New York University professor and media critic Jay Rosen and "social impact consultancy" Hearken (https://wearehearken.com/) developed it to improve political reporting by moving from a polling-centric approach to reporting on the issues important to communities.

The Citizens Agenda model of campaign reporting elevates the public and uses the newsroom as the public's servant, a conduit and a translator between the public and the politicians they elect.
